問題 V 次の文章について設問に答えよ。解答番号は ~

Most kinds of plastic take about 400 years to decompose¹, which means that all this plastic must still be around somewhere. Since it appeared in the 19th century, it makes sense that most of it is still on the planet! The existence of the Great Pacific Garbage Patch² was suggested in 1988. Using evidence from Alaska and the Sea of Japan, scientists thought that there must be a place somewhere in the North Pacific where plastic collected. But where?

The answer to that question came in 1997, when Charles J. Moore was returning home in his boat. He discovered what had suggested, but nobody had actually found until then. He found a huge mass of plastic floating in the Pacific Ocean.

Since its discovery, the Patch has been very carefully studied. Scientists believe that it was over time as a result of pollution. The sea currents³ “caught” the plastic garbage and gathered it together. Then, the garbage was held by the currents, so the garbage that was caught by the currents, the bigger the Patch became. really knows the size of the Patch because there aren’t many large pieces of plastic floating on the surface. happens is that the plastic decomposes into very small pieces, and these float just below the surface of the water.

Scientists think that about 80 percent of this garbage comes from as far away as North America, India, Africa, and Asia. The main concern is that because all this plastic stays in the ecosystem⁴, birds and fish eat it. Those that don’t die after eating it are eaten by other animals, and eventually the plastic ends up on our table. And that is only one of the dangers that the Great Pacific Garbage Patch represents.
