The Aging Society¹: Elderly Drivers

The percentage of serious traffic accidents caused by people 75 years old or older has 36 in Japan. According to the National Police Agency (NPA), it rose from 7.4 percent in 2005 to 12.9 percent in 2017. There were 418 out of 3,247 cases in 2017, and 49 percent of the elderly drivers who caused serious accidents showed some signs of dementia² or lowered cognitive³ abilities. If accidents included damaging objects or buildings, the percentage of traffic accidents caused by such drivers would be even higher. As Japan's population continues to age, these accidents will become a major problem.

The Road Traffic Law requires that elderly people take a cognitive function test every three years 37 they renew their driver's licenses. A medical checkup is then required if any signs of dementia are found, and their driver's licenses will be officially taken away. Doctors are also asked to report to the public safety commission in each prefecture if any of their patients who drive suffer from dementia. 38, stricter laws alone cannot make elderly people stop driving because some need cars for daily activities such as shopping and going to the doctor. Also, their physical abilities may have weakened only slightly.

We need to think about 39 to support these people and how to prevent accidents. In Saga, for example, volunteers living in the city created a system to offer alternative transportation to elderly people who give up their driver's licenses. The system is financed by donations⁴ and furusatonozei, a hometown tax. The NPA also plans to introduce a "limited" driver's license. Some elderly people are only 40 to drive with automatic brakes and a vision enhancement⁵ system, for example. Or, as in Victoria, Australia, some elderly people can only drive during the daytime, or to go to the supermarket or the doctor.

We can all agree that everyone needs a place to call “home.” Home is where we are most ourselves. Even so, it is surprisingly hard to pinpoint¹ what makes somewhere a good home. Most would agree that the location of our home can change throughout our lives. But, what about somewhere in a different country with different customs or even a different language? In Brooklyn, the protagonist² Eilis gives us her answer to this question through her struggle to find a place to call home in a foreign country.

Eilis is raised in Ireland during the depression in the early 1950s. As a young adult, she is unable to find work there, so she leaves for Brooklyn, NY, where her sister has arranged a boarding house³ for her to live in and a job for her. [A] For Eilis, home is where her family, particularly her sister, is. In Brooklyn, she does not know the people around her and the people around her do not know her. She does not know the customs and at her residence she is surrounded by strangers who are comfortable in Brooklyn and with the rules of the house. [B] Even at work, she is unable to make friendly chat with customers because she is unfamiliar with the local sensibilities⁴. All around, she feels a sense of inferiority⁵ and alienation⁶. Meanwhile, whenever she reads her letters from her sister in Ireland or hears Irish songs, she is filled with a longing for “home.” Eilis is suffering from homesickness.

However, she begins to grow new roots. [C] She attends an accounting class at Brooklyn University and earns professional qualifications⁷. She meets Tony, a kind Italian boy and they fall in love at first sight. Eilis finds someone who, like her sister, thinks of her all the time and who unconditionally appreciates her presence. After this, she 45 in her surroundings, her performance at work improves and she builds relationships of mutual trust with her boarding mates. In short, she finds a place in Brooklyn where she feels useful and wanted. Has Brooklyn replaced Ireland as her home?

Suddenly, Eilis receives notice that her sister has died. Eilis must choose: does she stay in Brooklyn and continue her new life or does she go back to Ireland to help her mother, who is now alone? When Tony lovingly tells her to go and that “home is home,” Eilis replies, “I’m not sure I have a home anymore.” Torn between two places, Eilis does not know what home is anymore. [D] She goes back, where her mother and childhood friend welcome her. She is offered her sister’s job as an accountant, and even finds a suitable companion. Eilis is confronted with a difficult decision. She has two places she can choose from to call home. In the end, Eilis chooses Brooklyn over her birthplace, showing us that the best home is not necessarily the place we were born.

Brooklyn reflects an increasingly common trend in today’s global society: it is often not the case that the people who call a place home were born there, or even in that country. The personal freedom we have in modern society gives each of us the possibility to explore the world and establish ourselves somewhere we truly feel needed and at home.
